FOREWORD

The life of Indonesian people is currently being hit by various problems. Starting from the problems of farmers living in rural areas to the problem experienced by the urban communities. In Nagari Sungai Tanang society in West Sumatra, the difficulty experienced by the farmers is poverty, this happens as a result of livelihood vulnerability to changes. Erwin discuss this issue in terms of changes in family life in West Sumatra and strategies needed to face that change. HIV/AIDS epidemic issues attract Yanuar Farida Wismayanti attention. According to her, the epidemic is now at 'concentrated' (a concentrated epidemic) level. This means that HIV/AIDS spread concentrated in 'high risk' population groups among female sex workers. A more intensive prevention strategies is needed, especially strategies to foster awareness among sex workers on how to avoid this deadly disease.

Drug abuse and illicit drug trafficking has also becoming an issue that is very alarming and continued to grow, this problem has also becoming a common problem among Indonesian people. The adjudication of this issue required a strategy that involves the entire nation in a movement intended to tackling drugs. Ivo Noviana assumes that there must be an awareness and active participation of the entire community. It seems that the driving spirit of the motto "prevention is better than cure" should advocate continuously.

In their developing stages, every children requires a life that can satisfy his/her needs, such as their need for affection, attention, food or good nutrition, health, and sense of security. But apparently, according to Anwar Sitepu and Irmayani, not all children get these things from their environment. Many children are, in fact, actually get negative treatment from their environment, even from their parents or families, such as rejection, humiliation, abandoned, this thing can cause the child mental development to be disturbed.

In the case of rural societies, Muchtar tried to raise the issue of Papua's poor community empowerment strategy. The district development program idea inspired us to not only solved an economic problem but also how to empowered people in their impoverished condition. So is the problem when people cornered on the issue of termination of employment as the impact of companies' competition that can not be avoided. Government policies and regulations that effect the economic life of the workers also should be able to contribute. This has become the concern of Abu Hanifa and Suyanto.

The occurrences of natural disasters in a relatively short and repeated cycle every year, also need to get government attention. Various structural (structural approach) government efforts, was not fully able to address the problem of flood in Indonesia. Ruida Murni states that prevention efforts should focus more on community participation tailored accordingly to the needs of society.
